. Keko and Wendy: on the very first page I clicked to read the synopsis, which also stated that it was being released in 2018, I think I was the only one who realized they were speaking of the current year, not referring to it as being a 2017 film. I don't like those kinds of movie/video game connections, I always feel it cheapens it, like it's being played off as a real adaptation, when it isn't. Just like how there are plenty of films that have been made about video games and they never got adapted to a movie. That said, I'm not really a fan of movies that are set in the future, and have nothing to do with the recent past. It's just a fad, really, and once they lose their novelty, they're just too late. I think they should stick to making movies about the modern world, like The Walking Dead series, which is based off of the comics, and makes more sense to me than a movie about a world with hover cars and flying cars, robot assassins, etc. but I digress. LOL about calling it "the third main Disney animated movie" I'm pretty sure that's how it was when they made Hercules, that's why I was confused, too. I personally loved The Princess and the Frog and would love to see more. I'm not sure how I feel about what's been released so far, mostly Frozen, Moana and Cinderella, I like them and would love to see more, but I don't think that they have that great of a message. And so far, the movies are all about women, it seems, and I'm not a fan of that. It's cute and all but it seems Disney is giving the general public what it wants. I'd rather get a good message without a good movie. Queen of Katwe is a good message, but a pretty bad movie. I don't think they're giving the public what it wants, I think they're going the other way, I think that a lot of people want movies that are happy and positive and stuff. I don't, I just want a movie that has a message. I want to watch a movie that has a good message, I'm not interested in watching a movie that has the message that "women are better off than men" or "white people are better off than people of color" or "gay people are better off than straight people", because 82157476af
